Bunnings statement: APVMA decision to restrict the sale of second-generation anticoagulant rodenticides

Attributable to Bunnings Chief Operating Officer, Ryan Baker:

We welcome the additional clarity and direction of the Australian Pesticides and Veterinary Medicines Authority's (APVMA) recent decision to restrict the sale of second-generation anticoagulant rodenticides (SGARs).

Following the APVMA's announcement, we are now working with our team and suppliers to remove these products by June 30, close to nine months ahead of the proposed 12-month implementation timeframe.

We recognise and understand the views raised by community and environmental groups, wildlife advocates and others who have taken a strong interest in this issue. As always, we will continue to be guided by the APVMA as the federal regulator in relation to the sale of these products.

We will also work with suppliers to ensure our customers can continue to access effective solutions to manage infestations and protect their homes and businesses.

On background:

- Like many retailers, Bunnings has sold a range of rodent control products, including anticoagulant rodenticides and non-poisonous alternatives, to provide customers with choice depending on their specific needs.
- Bunnings is working with suppliers to transition away from affected SGAR products and ensure suitable alternative rodent control options are available.
- Bunnings will continue to comply with all regulatory requirements and decisions of the APVMA.
